Discover more about the Army Reserve

When you register your interest online or at visit a Army Careers Office you are not committed to join. You can request more information about the roles that interest you and find out if the Army Reserve is for you. If you decide it is, you'll be ready to start the online application process.

Giving your time

How much time you give depends on you. Army Air Corps units have a minimum training commitment of 19 or 27 days. You are required to complete this in order to receive the annual tax-free lump sum at the end of the year, known as a bounty. Training takes place on Tuesday evenings and some weekends. There's also a two week annual training period in the UK or abroad. Because it is part time you decide how much training you do, and when you do it, with our instructions to you

Employment protection

Joining the Army as a Reservist won't put your job at risk. There is a legal requirement to tell your employer, line manager, so make sure that you do. It's a good idea to do it in plenty of time. That way, if you need to take time off, you can give them plenty of warning and they can arrange to cover your absence.

Army Air Corps – Recruit Training

Most of our units recruit and train locally; they make up a large “COMBAT” percentage of the Army Reserve and train at centres mostly in large towns, and cities so finding one near to you should not be too difficult. Army Reserve recruit training takes about 30 days training a year, comprising some Tuesday evenings, and some weekends, unless you are able to attend a two-week training recruit period. The training commitment reduces to 19 days per year, and no mandatory training period for up to 3 years, for ex-Regulars who have recently left the Army. There is also a financial bonus.
